In the larger churches the director serves as a full-time, paid worker. But among the vast majority of churches such leadership will be furnished either by the pastor himself or by volunteer workers serving under his supervision. In either case, there is imperative need of a manual containing two kinds of materials. First, a brief, practical statement of the principles and methods of social and recreational leadership that are consistent with the ideals of the church. Second, source materials of nine distinct types, namely, (1) Ice Breakers, (2) Children's games, (3) Active indoor games, (4) Quiet indoor games, (5) Outdoor games, (6) Stunts and tricks, (7) Pencil and paper games, (8) Songs, (9) Turis games, and (10) Programs for special occasions. For several years the author has given courses in this subject in Boston and in Northwestern Universities. Supervised practice or demonstration work has been carefully carried on. The students who have specialized in this field have been of very great service in discovering materials and in adapting them to use in the church. In preparing this handbook the writer has had in mind the needs of these former students, many of whom are now holding important positions on the staffs of well organized churches, and of all other persons who feel the challenge of using leisure time, under church auspices, for character-building purposes.
